EXTRAORDINARY TALE OF THE

MASSACRE OF THREE BOATS' CREWS.

Yesterday morning J. Sampson. late mate of the Glasgow barque Roseneath, arrived in Liverpool. Sampson is the only survivor of a boat's crew of the Roseneath, his comrades having been brutally murdered. It seems that the Roseneath was abandoned whilst on a voyage from Mixillones to the Channel for orders, about the middle of April last. The disaster happened off Cape Horn, Sampson, the carpenter, and three others having to leave their vessel before the captain and the remainder of the crew could get away, as their boat was being stoved against the side of the vessel. After being a day and a night in their small craft Sampson and his comrades were met by a party of natives of Terra-del-Fuego, who were in three canoes. The shipwreeked men were not far from land when fallen in with by the natives, the latter of whom appeared to be very friendly. After obtaining several articles which were in the boat, the natives suddenly attacked the sailors with the exception of the mate. The shipwrecked men were unarmed, but the natives had surreptitiously become possessed of huge clubs which had been secreted at the bottom of their canoes. After killing the mate's companions they divested the bodies of the clothing, and then pitched them into the sea. Contrary to expectation, they did not attempt to eat the corpses. The natives afterwards made for the shore, taking with them the boat, and the mate (Sampson), who was in an extreme state of uncertainty as to the fate reserved for him, strange to say, was not molested, but was allowed to go about the beach and the rocks at leisure. They gave him no food: but, like the islanders, he had to subsist on the shellfish which was to be captured near the rocks. The men never did any work, the food gathering being performed by the women, who sometimes accompanied the men in their canoe expeditions. The natives were continually upon the water, and were always on the look out for any small boat with occupants. It appears that while Sampson was with the islanders he saw two whaling boats come in view. These were intercepted by the natives, and in each case the whole of the crews were murdered by the treacherous Fuegians. Sampson remained in his captivity for fifty-five days, and was rescued by the merest chance by some Patagonians from an adjacent island.

A celebrated writer of vandevilles, being caught in a shower, took shelter under a portico. A very pretty girl soon lifted the window, and, after looking at him attentively for a moment, sout out a servant to him with an umbrella. The next day the delighted author got himself up in his most fascinating style, and, as the umbrella was an old one he laid it aside as a souvenir, purchased a new one of the costliest taste, and called on the lady to return her flattering loan. She received the umbrella, evidently without remarking the change, and after listening with curious gravity to the rather pressing tenderness of the dramatist's acknowledgment, she suddenly comprehended that he was enamoured of her, and forthwith naively explained that, as he stood in the way of a gentleman who wished to come to see her unobserved, she had sent him the umbrella to get him off the front steps!
